Repusearch
Five directions

An identity for a reputation intelligence firm whose audience reads board papers, not marketing.

Sundial

Reputation is hard to visualise. A shadow is not: every organisation casts one, and it follows them wherever they go.

Search results, media coverage and AI answers are the light. They decide which side is lit and how long the shadow runs behind it. Repusearch reads that light, shows the client what others see, and helps turn the bright side toward them.

Echo Chamber

A single continuous line spirals into the centre of the R. Outside it is the noise; inside is the person you need to reach.

Read again and the bands are a target: reputation work is reaching a specific set of people, and getting to the centre is the whole job. Read a third time and it is a labyrinth. The route in exists, but it is not obvious, and that is why a client needs an adviser rather than a dashboard.

Control

The mark looks like a microchip. It is actually binary, the language the web is written in, and the seven bytes say one word.

The U in REPUSEARCH is drawn apart from the rest, and it is the letter the whole brand turns on. U is you: the client, the executive, the organisation being searched. Everything the technology does is in service of that one letter.

Threads

Every organisation leaves a digital footprint, and it arrives along channels: search, news, reviews, the answers a machine gives.

The lines are those channels. The R is never drawn; it exists only where they are deflected. Repusearch does not invent a reputation, it works on the conduits that carry one. Turn the bed and the letter vanishes, which is discretion drawn rather than claimed.

Fingerprint

A footprint is what you leave behind. A fingerprint is what you are: unrepeatable, carried everywhere, impossible to swap.

It is also the mark that opens things, and every phone has trained people to read it as safety. Read a third time and the ridges are contour lines. Public opinion has cliffs, and nobody reads a contour map for fun; they read it because they intend to cross the ground.
